ABSTRACT

Community organizing can encompass coalition building or community development, each of which represents steps in getting something done in a community. Before undertaking a project, it is important to figure out the exact problem the community is trying to address. From there, it can be determined how to address it, who else will be involved, and how the steps to success will be measured. This packet provides tools, tips, and resources that will help communities undertake needed measures to reduce substance abuse and gun violence. It includes national organizations, publications, and community leaders who have expertise in community organizing. (Contains 13 resources.) (JDM)

Description of the Issue

Community organizing can be known as coalition building or community development. This will mean different things to different communities, however, each can be seen as a way to create helping systems in communities, (AHEC/Community Partners). Regardless of the phrasing, each is but one step in a process of getting something done in your community. It is important to understand which problem your community is trying to address, how you are going to address it, who else you are going to work with and how successful you will be while you are community organizing. To begin to get information, check the "Resources", "Get Help" and "Take Action" sections on Join Together Online at www.jointogether.org/. These areas have frequently updated resource and contact information as well as online versions of our Monthly Action Kits. These kits offer tools, tips and resources that will help communities take action to reduce substance abuse and gun violence.

Community Stories

St. Joseph County Coalition Against Drugs, South Bend, Indiana has been successful in building a coalition, helping youth-serving agencies to collaborate, developing a public awareness campaign and getting young people more involved. As the result of technical assistance and asking the right questions, the coalition formed some critical alliances. The Local Coordinating Council formed an alliance with Healthy Communities Partnership and United Communities which began exploring the possibility of a merger and positioned them to pursue a Center for Substance Abuse Prevention Grant. Contact Gail Ryniak at 219-234-0051 ext. 323.

The Community Prevention Network of Western New York, Amherst, New York has been successful in building a coalition as well as getting businesses and clergy involved. With some technical assistance and coalition building efforts, they were able to triple the membership of faith community, the business community and the criminal justice community. They launched a local policy panel with a particular focus on fake identifications and under 21 alcohol-serving vendors. Contact Janet Duffy at 716-831-2298.
